Always have pink eyes, because in these cases the cornea is absolutely free of all pigment as well as the iris, and as it is absolutely transparent the blood vessels make their color shine through.

Life of Washington

By Woodrow Wilson

President of the United States

"The powers of the executive of this country are more definite and better understood, perhaps, than those of any other country," Washington had said, "and my aim has been, and will continue to be, neither to stretch nor to relax from them in any instance whatever, unless compelled to by imperative circumstances," and that was what he meant the country to know, whether the law's purpose was good or bad.

Wash Over English Treaty.
The next year the people knew what Mr. Jay had done. He reached New York May 28, 1796; and the treaty he brought with him was laid before the senate on the 8th of June. On the 24th of July the country knew what he had agreed to and the senate had ratified. There was an instant outburst of wrath. It swept from one end of the country to the other.

The treaty yielded so much, gained so little, that to accept it seemed a veritable humiliation. The northwestern ports were, indeed, to be given up at last; the boundaries between English and American territory were to be determined by commissioners; unrestricted commerce with England herself, and a free direct trade with her East Indian possessions, were conceded; but not a word was said about the impressment of American seamen; American claims for damages for uncollected trade with the West Indian referred to a commission, along with American debts to Englandmen; the coveted trade with the West India islands was secured only to vessels of seventy tons and under, and at the cost of renouncing the right to export sugar, molasses, coffee, cocoa, or cotton to Europe.

Washington agreed with the senate that ratifications of the treaty ought not to be exchanged without a modification of the clauses respecting the West Indian trade, and October had come before now and better terms could be agreed upon; but he had no doubt that the treaty as a whole ought to be accepted. The opposition party in congress had refused to vote money for an efficient navy, and so had made it impossible to check British aggressions; they must now accept this unpalatable treaty as better at any rate than war.

Storm Rages Fiercely.
It was hard to stand steady in the storm. The country took fire as it had done at the passage of the Stamp Act. Harder things had never been said of king and parliament than were now said of Washington and his advisers. Many stout champions stood by his defence--none stouter or more formidable than Hamilton, no longer a member of the cabinet, for imperative private interests had withdrawn him these six months and more, but none the less redoubtable in the field of controversy.

For long, nevertheless, the battle went heavily against the treaty. Even Washington, for once, stood a little while perplexed, not doubting his own purpose, indeed, but very anxious what the outcome should be. Protests against his signing the treaty poured in upon him from every quarter of the country; many of them earnest almost to the point of enmity, some hot with angry comment. His reply, when he vouchsafed any, was always that his very gratitude for the approbation of the country in the past fixed him but the more firmly in his resolution to deserve it now by obeying his own conscience.

"It is very desirable," he wrote to Hamilton, "to ascertain, if possible, after the paroxysm of the fever is a little abated, what the real temper of the people is concerning it; for at present the cry against the treaty is like that against a mad dog; but he showed himself very calm to the gen-

Bright Brass.
A great time and labor saver, in keeping brass copper and other metals bright and shining, either indoors or outdoors, in any kind of weather, is to clean and scour in the usual way, and give them a coat of negative varnish, to be obtained at a store.
